1. Introduction

Human activities in the workplace should be sustainable and environmentally friendly. Since many past practices have been harmful, it is crucial to adapt consumption and occupational practices while developing greener alternatives. This includes promoting skills and technologies that minimize resource use, recycle waste, reduce energy consumption, and prevent pollution. Vocational Education and Training (VET) plays a key role in equipping individuals with the necessary skills for sustainable employment and entrepreneurship. However, many existing regulations and standards do not fully support the green transition, maintaining unsustainable business practices. Integrating Education for Sustainable Development (ESD) in VET institutions can help address these gaps.

The LET's MIMIC project aims to make VET systems more sustainable and relevant by embedding eco-education and environmental management into VET programs across Europe. It follows a multi-stakeholder approach to enhance training, promote technical and vocational careers, and support lifelong learning. A key innovation in the project is the integration of biomimicry, a strategy that draws inspiration from nature to develop sustainable solutions.

This report summarises the LET's MIMIC project dissemination activities, which aim to raise awareness of project objectives and share results with the VET sector and broader lifelong learning community. The activities follow the dissemination strategy outlined in D5.1: Dissemination plan and visual identity.
